

Introduction

Peter Jensen

The Doctrine Commission of the Anglican Church of Australia has been examining the theological issues surrounding sexual and other forms of abuse since 2005. We decided that the best way to assist the church in thinking through these issues was to produce a preliminary report which highlighted the key issues, and then to author a collection of essays which could examine particular theological themes in more detail.

Our preliminary report forms part of this introduction, followed by a series of essays written by members of the Doctrine Commission. The report has the assent of us all. The individual essays reflect only the view of their respective authors.

The past twenty years has seen an increased awareness of the dangers of sexual abuse not only in our society but sadly also within the church. While the Bible is not silent on the issue, a recognition of the horrors of sexual abuse, and its prevalence, has given fresh impetus to a theological reflection upon the causes and consequences of this evil. These essays are presented to the wider church as a contribution to that ongoing reflection, a painful reminder of the sinfulness of sin and the recognition that we are much in need of God's grace and forgiveness.

The first essay, by Muriel Porter, seeks to highlight areas in which our pastoral practice may be exacerbating the damage already done by sexual abuse. Victims of sexual abuse often carry a deep sense of unworthiness, guilt and shame, which, Porter argues, can be made worse by (male) clergy preaching against the 'masculine' sin of pride. She says, "Pulpit (and retreat) exhortations to strive for humility can be nothing short of spiritually dangerous for people whose cultural conditioning and harsh life experience has left them with little self-esteem". Porter also notes that overly simplistic teaching on forgiveness can also be a deeply troubling issue for the victims of sexual abuse. Clergy need to acknowledge the fact that the journey towards forgiveness is a long one for survivors of sexual abuse, and to assist people sensitively on this journey.

The next three essays seek to expose some hidden causes of sexual abuse. Scott Cowdell argues that there are systemic disorders within the institutional church which are a contributing factor to sexual abuse. Church disciplinary proceedings against aberrant priests deal only with the symptoms, while leaving the root disease untreated. According to Cowdell, abuse in the church is linked to a theological imaging of God as an abusive God, stemming from the penal substitutionary theory of atonement. Cowdell argues that we need to recover a Trinitarian understanding of the cross, in order to address a mistaken conception of an abusive God.

Peter Adam's essay examines sexual abuse in the wider context of abuses of power and authority. Our God-given power and authority is abused when exercised for the destruction and defeat of others, and equally abused when we fail to exercise it as we should. Adam recognises signs of both dimensions of the abuse of power and authority in our churches. The first is manifest in clergy who use the power and authority of their position to manipulate and abuse. The second is manifest in the reluctance of church leaders to discipline those who have done so. Adam writes, "It is typical that sexual abuse is perpetrated as a sin of commission, and then covered up by church leaders in a sin of omission".

The essay by John Dunnill examines that most fundamental of all causes—sin itself. Dunnill examines the way in which the sexual abuse of children reveals the character of sin. Sin is the condition of distorted relationship between humanity and God the creator. Sin springs from the universal awareness of death, which causes anxiety that generates the forms of disordered conduct we call sinful. Dunnill traces the dynamics of sin in relation to the specific sin of child sexual abuse, and concludes that it is but an outworking of a radical evil which has corrupted our human condition.

The essay by Glenn Davies and Michael Stead examines the Bible's teaching on human sexuality. The authors begin by recognising that past distortions of the Bible's teaching may have contributed to sexual abuse. In light of past misappropriations, the essay seeks to outline God's good purposes for human sexuality, the disastrous effects on human sexuality stemming from sin, and the power of God's grace to overcome the effects of all sin—including sexual sin—and to bring healing and forgiveness.

The final two essays offer perspectives on the resources that we have in the gospel of Jesus Christ for responding to abuse and its aftermath.

Heather Thomson addresses the issue of forgiveness. Forgiveness in relation to sexual abuse raises a variety of questions about the prerequisites and limits of forgiveness, about the role of justice and punishment, and about the abuse of forgiveness ('cheap grace'). Thomson examines these and other issues, in order to develop a Christian theology of forgiveness which is attuned to the special issues raised by sexual abuse.

Andrew McGowan addresses some theological issues associated with 'truth and reconciliation' and the quest for what has come to be known as 'restorative justice'. After giving an overview of the principles of restorative justice, McGowan presents a biblical exploration on 'Truth', with particular reference to the Gospel of John, seeking to shed some light on the important theological link between truth and reconciliation.

We are pleased to contribute these essays to a special edition of St Mark's Review. This work is offered in the hope it will help the church to reflect on the theological issues arising from sexual abuse, and to incorporate this into our thinking and pastoral practice.

Preliminary Report from the Doctrine Commission concerning Theological Issues Surrounding Sexual and Other Forms of Abuse

1. Preface

1.1. At the behest of the General Synod Professional Standards Commission, both the General Synod (Resolution 35/04 (f)) and its Standing Committee (10.3.15) asked the Doctrine Commission for a report on theological issues concerning abuse of the vulnerable. The Professional Standards Commission has subsequently clarified the thinking behind this request. In summary, the Professional Standards Commission has asked the Doctrine Commission to examine:

the theological issues underlying sexual abuse and harassment in the Church...(and) the Church's responsibility for the physical, emotional and spiritual welfare and safety of all people within its own community including children and other vulnerable people, the abused and known abusers of children or other vulnerable people.

In its comments on this reference, the Professional Standards Commission notes that a vulnerability to abuse exists in relationships "where there is an improper use of power and/or crossing of appropriate boundaries by an abuser". It identifies as particularly vulnerable, people who are elderly, those who live with poverty, disability, mental illness and grief.

- 1.2. The Doctrine Commission first received this reference in 2005, but still has considerable work to do before offering a full-scale report. The delay reflects both the number of other references to the Commission and the inherent importance and complexity of this subject.
- 1.3. The Doctrine Commission is convinced of the need for profound theological reflection and plans to study the subject under such themes as power and authority, the culture of the church, truth and reconciliation, the nature of sex, and the nature of sin. This work lies ahead of us.
- 1.4. Given the importance of the subject, however, the Doctrine Commission is also offering to the General Synod this brief interim Report. The Report seeks mainly to indicate the areas which need theological reflection, to encourage all (but especially bishops and theological educators) to continue to think through these issues, and to offer some preliminary suggestions about the way in which theological truth can help meet pastoral needs.
- 1.5. Much in the way in which the Church has responded to the scandal of abuse has been both commendable and necessary. However, theological issues are yet to be fully addressed. It is for this reason that the Doctrine Commission is committed to offering its best efforts to the Australian Church, and would be grateful for the prayers of God's people towards such a result.

2. Why theological reflection on abuse is important

Theological reflection is required to explicate why sexual and other abuse is so significant for the church, drawing on gospel understandings of the human person in community.

- 2.1. Every human being is a created, embodied, social self. As created, we are frail but individually precious to God. As embodied, we experience the world physically. As social, we learn who we are as part of the network of family, kin, tribe and humanity. In this, and in the promised new heavens and new earth, we are created to share righteousness and love with God and with each other.
- 2.2. As embodied and social selves, living in the world after the Fall, we are vulnerable to suffering both through our bodies and through our relationships. Violence against the body, such as torture, assault and sexual abuse, creates profound and persistent personal dislocation and pain. This is particularly true for sexual abuse and the abuse of children. It is also true for social abuse such as vilification, rejection, neglect and exploitation.
- 2.3. In all physical abuse, the self is violated through the body. So significant is our sexual nature, however, that the damage to body, mind and soul is intense. The fabric of our lives, physical and relational, is torn. The trust which is indispensable to all human relationships is stolen by the perpetrator.
- 2.4. God's righteous compassion is over all of us, but especially those who are young, elderly and for other reasons weak or powerless. It is particularly offensive to God when they are violated by people with an obligation to treat them with respect and love. The Bible tells us that we shall continue to live in a world in which evil things happen. Indeed, all of us contribute to this state of affairs. Nevertheless there is also forgiveness, transformation and love in this world and the hope of God's new and perfect order in the world to come.
- 2.5. Sexual abuse may happen in private, but its ramifications are wide ranging in the lives of those who are abused, their families and communities. When it occurs (often secretly) among believers, it corrodes fellowship. When disclosed it must be dealt with, as it makes a mockery of the communion of God's people and dishonours Christ's name.

3. The problems abuse creates for survivors

Theological reflection needs to address these issues, among others, for the sake of the survivors of abuse and those who support them. These are matters which call for the most sensitive pastoral care grounded in the wisest theology and informed understandings of the dynamics and effects of abuse.

- 3.1. Problems for faith. If sexual abuse is linked to faith, it poses an immense challenge to the faith of the victim of abuse. She or he may have prayed to God for safety and protection, and no help has come. The abuser has destroyed their confidence in God. The ensuing anger and/or immense spiritual loneliness are not resolved by ignoring them, or by exhortations to have faith, or other cheap panaceas. But powerful resources exist in patient and attentive listening, and prayerful Christian fellowship, informed by an understanding of sin and evil, and sustained by the hope of the gospel of the crucified one.

- 3.2. Problems for the self. The violation of the body is often followed by enduring despair, shame, and self-accusation, contributing to a loss of the sense of the valued self. Such difficulties will not be ameliorated merely by pastoral exhortation and advice. Once again, however, there can be powerful healing in knowing that we are created in God's image. Furthermore, the experience of God's grace in redemption, can (with patience) help bring a measure of trust and restoration of the valued self. Full healing waits for God's future.
- 3.3. The problem of the perpetrator. Such is the impact of sexual abuse, that forgiveness may seem risky, dangerous or an impossible demand. Knowing that Jesus taught us to love our enemies and to forgive those who offend us, many people who have been abused despair of their spiritual state. The situation is often made worse by exhortations to forgive, or even demands to forgive and be reconciled if the perpetrator has apologised. Forgiveness, which arises from the gospel, offers a wonderful freedom from the impact of violence and abuse, but pastoral teaching about forgiveness must be understood and offered sensitively, with great wisdom.
- 3.4. The problem of forgiveness. Concerning Christ's forgiveness, we need to note that there is a distinction to be made between the decision to forgive and the lifelong practice of forgiveness. Furthermore, the need for forgiveness should not be equated with the full restoration of previous relationships, let alone constitute an invitation to further violence. Reconciliation does not necessarily mean ongoing relationship in the same sense as before. The effects of some abuse cannot be undone or swept away, and the consequences for both parties may be long-lasting.
- 3.5. The problem of the church. Sometimes theological and ecclesiological errors distort the biblical teaching about God and contribute to a climate of abuse. The problems can become systemic and entrenched, with the suppression of truth and misapplied disciplinary processes. Where sexual abuse occurs in the context of the church, especially where the abuser is a person of power within the church, the whole church is accountable. The abuse must not be ignored or covered up. The hurt must be met by truth and repentance and an acceptance of appropriate responsibility and action.

4. The Power of the Gospel

It is a matter of deep shame that sexual abuse has occurred in our churches and has often been met with culpable naiveté. Turning once again to God's work in Christ and by the power of the Spirit, we move forward in hope.

- 4.1. We confess that our churches are far from perfect. And yet as we heed God's word and reflect the gospel of Jesus, we can build communities of faith, hope and love, through which God's love is experienced and lives transformed for the better. We are grateful for progress in addressing the issues of sexual and other forms of abuse, helping those who have been abused and challenging perpetrators to repentance and restitution.
- 4.2. We recognise that all Christ's people have a role to play in the discipline and godliness of the church. We are called to accept and care for people who have been abused and remain vulnerable, and to hold leadership and potential abusers of power to account. We need to detect and challenge systemic evil, and insist on standards of integrity and truthfulness as befits the gospel.
- 4.3. However, in maintaining the good spiritual and moral health of our Church, the leaders of God's people have a special responsibility. As well as being people of truth and integrity, they must be prepared to exercise such discipline as will build up and not tear down. Through the pastoral teaching of God's word, they will lead people to spiritual maturity, calling for genuine repentance and renewal. In particular they will be aware of those who listen to public teaching and the need to speak to the real situation of significant numbers of people who may be victims of abuse in other contexts and who need to receive the special consolations of the gospel.
- 4.4. A measure of our understanding of the gospel will be our willingness to care for the victims of abuse, and for the perpetrators of abuse. Those who offend may themselves be victims of abuse. The gospel offers the possibility of breaking this cycle. For offenders, too, are made in God's image; they too need the word of the cross and the forgiveness of sins; they too can experience the power of the Holy Spirit in their lives. But we will not minister satisfactorily to them by offering 'cheap grace' – the mercy of God without a transformational repentance which accepts the consequences of discipline.

5. Conclusions

- 5.1. The gospel tells us, while this world lasts, sin and evil are ever present, full healing may not come, and the church will continue to face failure, hypocrisy and abuse. We also know that in the gospel of Jesus Christ and in the church created by the gospel, we have a unique capacity for dealing with abuse and its aftermath. Our hope is for the coming of God's kingdom – 'the new heavens and new earth in which righteousness dwells'. This active hope sustains us.
- 5.2. These preliminary reflections are meant to communicate with urgency the ramifications of the problems of sexual and other forms of abuse. Our Church will not have addressed these matters in any way satisfactorily until the theological issues are considered in depth and incorporated into our thinking and pastoral practice.
